All societies go through periods of birth, development, decline, decay, regression, death, and rebirth based on economic/social/cultural/political organization around its technological forces of production and destruction. These societies also go through incremental periods of development of new technology and sources of energy, therefore improving their economic characteristics and thereby laying the foundation for a higher, more advanced form of society. In the process of the old moribund society dying away and the new nascent society being born in the womb of the old, societies reach a certain point of decline whereby what is produced cannot be distributed based on the system of exchange developed in that particular society. The robust technological revolution in a particular society, therefore is the fundamental basis of the economic, political, social, and cultural revolutions that follow. Culture, the sum total of ways a people live, permeates all aspects of any social formation. Although transplanted from Europe in a cellular colonial form initially, this is a white society, whose social, political, economic, and technological systems are made in the image and interests of Europeans.
